

CREATING A CULTURE OF FEEDBACK

Did you invite community feedback by administering YouthTruth’s family survey at your school? In addition to closing the feedback loop with your students, you can further strengthen your school’s culture of feedback by also letting your families know that their participation in the survey is important to you. Like with your students, just one way you can express your appreciation is by closing the feedback loop with a simple message of “Thank you. I heard you.” using the prompts below to help you get started. You might want to include your reflections in a regular newsletter or share them in person at a community meeting.

This simple act of reflecting what you heard back to your community makes feedback a two-way conversation and demonstrates that listening is an important part of your leadership. Letting your community know that you’ve heard them also has the power to encourage participation in years to come.

Dear Families, thank you. I heard you.

I learned that _____

I was surprised that _____

Here’s a question that I have: _____

I am proud that _____

Here are three quotations from your comments that I’m still thinking about:

I plan to follow up on hearing from you by _____
